Additional clarifications and hypothetical plan of study (Proposal for change in the M.A. program in Classics: adding an option)

There have already been a number of students who have been pursuing both an M.A. in Classics and the MATWL program. These students, unless in extraordinary circumstances, do spend at least three years and a summer on both degrees. The proposal for a change in the Classics M.A. waives the requirement for graduate courses in Greek for the Classics M.A., thus considerably helping students pursuing both degrees. The reason for that is the fact that Greek is very rarely taught in the K-12 curriculum in the US. The exit requirement for four undergraduate courses in Greek (which the students will probably have taken in their undergraduate institution, but could take at UK, if needed) only ensures a broader formation as a classicist for any Latin teacher. This is not a proposal for a concurrent degree, but only for a change in the Classics program (of a requirement self-imposed some years ago) which would allow more expeditious pursuing of both degrees.

Here is a hypothetical academic plan for completing both degrees. The student would select the most likely option A Thesis.

- Nine credit hours of course work could be shared between the programs.
- Six credit hours of the preparation of the teaching portfolio should count as thesis. Such a portfolio would include, apart from the work on the standards, a special pedagogical project: preparing a scholastic edition of a text, developing a special grammatical topic or sequence of lessons with an original set of exercises related to it and discussing the methology behind it etc. The thesis, while not being a teaching portfolio itself, would be on a pedagogical matter closely associated with the portfolio. For example, if a student teaches a certain text during the practicum, this text could be prepared as a scholastic edition using explanations only in the target language (Active Latin is a distinctive feature of the UK Classics M.A. program, and in fact the feature drawing so many applicants to UK, since there is rising interest in Active Latin in the US secondary education, and UK is a pioneer in it).
